Not illustrated. 1897 edition. Excerpt: ... A WAR WOMAN, WITH the increase of population and mining operations in Montana after the discovery and opening of the gold mines in 1862, and the construction of additional military posts along the Upper Missouri, came also the increase of the boating business between the city of Saint Louis, Missouri, and Fort Benton, Montana, the last named place being the head of navigation on the Missouri river. In the years 1867-8 and 1869, the tonnage of freight transported up this river was enormous, over thirty steamers being constantly employed during the season of navigation in its transportation. While the wood along the timbered bends for nearly a thousand miles of the steamer's course, could be had for the chopping and taking for steam heating and other necessary purposes, yet the difficulty and loss of time by the boat crew in finding dry wood within the range of the tie-up, led the owners and captains of these steamers to induce a class of men to establish woodyards at convenient distances apart along the banks bordering the channel of the stream. Each camp or yard, for the most part acting independent of the other, the price of wood being regulated by its particular location, or the kind and quality of the wood in rank. The life led by these isolated wood choppers or owners of the woodyards, was, owing to the hundreds of miles of territory roamed over by bands of hostile Indians, likened unto a guard or sentinel continually at his post. His life or his property was ever insecure. Thus it was, that during the years above mentioned, nearly or quite one third of these men so employed lost their lives, the wood destroyed and stock run off by Indians. A party of this class of men, together with some professional hunters, wolfers and trappers,...
